Howard Colvin was one of the most important historians of the twentieth century. He transformed the study of architectural history in Britain. His death in 2007 marked the end of an era. This book is the first attempt to assess his achievement and his legacy. More importantly, it also poses the question of what happens next. Architectural history as a discipline is institutionally in crisis. The number of university posts and jobs in local authorities and heritage bodies has dramatically declined over the last decade. Yet, as a subject, architectural history has never had it so good. There are more students, more conferences, more books, and more interest in it than ever before. Featuring contributions from some of the country's leading practitioners, Architectural History After Colvin is thus a celebration of a pioneering scholar, a reflection on the subject he transformed, and an invitation to consider what it will look like in the years to come.

The contributors in order of appearance are: William Whyte; John Harris; Frank Salmon; Anthony Geraghty; Andrew Saint; Alan Powers; Malcolm Airs; Simon Thurley; and J. Mordaunt Crook. The book is rounded off with an index. The book is 128 pages long, most of the essays are illustrated, and it is bound in real cloth with a full colour dustwrapper; ISBN 978-1-9077-3032-0, and all at the bargain price of £30.
